Sexual abuse counsellors’ responses to stress and trauma: a social work perspective

Margaret Pack

Margaret Pack completed her doctorate in social work in 2001 as a ‘Bright Future’ Scholar at Victoria University of Wellington. During the period of her scholarship, she studied with Professor Jan Fook, Professor of Social Work at Deakin University, Geelong, and presented the preliminary findings of this research to the Centres Against Sexual Assault in Greater Victoria, Australia.

Abstract

Based on qualitative interviews with 36 ACC Approved counsellors, this research explores the range of social, organisational and theoretical factors that impact on sexual abuse counsellors. In this context the author explores the relevance of ‘vicarious traumatisation’ and the strategies and theoretical approaches used, that foster counsellors’ wellbeing. Current literature about vicarious traumatisation suggests that counsellors’ exposure to their client’s trauma may increase their risk of burn out and secondary traumatisation. The relationship between counsellors’ responses to their clients’ trauma and the theoretical frameworks they use in practice and the impact of the counsellor’s work on their relationships with their partners, colleagues, friends and family, are explored. The model of stress and trauma developed highlights that counsellors experience stress when there are inconsistencies between their personal philosophies, their practice experience (or what they are exposed to in their dealings with clients) and the theoretical frameworks they use in practice. This sense of disjuncture provides the impetus for the development of alternative frameworks for practice that increase the resiliency of counsellors who work intensively with traumatic material. The model of stress and trauma developed introduces a multi-level understanding of the challenges faced by sexual abuse counsellors and the implications for their relationships with their significant others.

Introduction

Working with sexual abuse survivors is rewarding. It is also fraught with contradictions and challenges. I became aware of some of these rewards and challenges whilst working as a social worker in two different settings. The first was a community mental health centre and the second, a national sexual abuse unit. In search of solutions to patterns I saw occurring in both workplaces, both of which focused on therapy with clients who were disclosing abuse, I enrolled in doctoral research on the topic of ‘vicarious traumatisation’. Vicarious traumatisation is a concept that refers to the transformation of the professional helper’s sense of self, beliefs and world view through their empathetic engagement with traumatic disclosures (McCann and Pearlman, 1990). More simply put, bearing witness to personal narratives of suffering from survivors puts us at risk of travelling a parallel process of traumatisation to our clients. Ironically, the risks of vicarious traumatisation are considered to be cumulative and to increase over time. I wished to investigate if the concept of vicarious traumatisation, a concept developed in the United States, had relevance in the New Zealand context where much sexual abuse counselling is publicly funded. Van Heughten (2000) and Hindmarsh (1986) had both discovered in their doctoral research that social workers in New Zealand sought greater autonomy and control over their work through a movement into specialist roles and private practice. I wished to focus on what happened after there had been the transition into private counselling practice in the field of ACC contracted counselling for sexual abuse. Specifically, I wished to explore if counsellors were more negatively affected by the material to which they were exposed and engaged with, and if so, to investigate the coping strategies they employed to adjust to the rigours of day-to-day work.

Aims of the research

The original aim of the research was to ask counsellors registered with ACC if they experienced any of the signs and symptoms mentioned in the vicarious traumatisation literature. However, as my reading progressed, it seemed important to allow participants to tell their personal narrative of vicarious traumatisation as they had experienced it over their careers. Once the sources of stress and trauma were identified, the aim was to develop a theoretical model of stress and trauma among those involved in counselling trauma survivors to suggest models of practice to ameliorate the effects for the worker.

As a social worker who looked systemically at problems, I decided to interview the significant others who supported the counsellors in their work. The views of the significant others were missing in the vicarious traumatisation literature and yet relationships were one of the major areas to be impacted upon, according to this literature (Johnson, 1993 and 1995).
Literature review

Pearlman and Saakvitne's (1995) concept of vicarious traumatic stress seemed the most relevant to the experiences I had had in the workplaces whose primary concern was dealing with survivors of sexual abuse trauma. Fox and Cooper (1998) had used vicarious traumatic stress as a framework to investigate the effects of client suicide on social workers working as psychotherapists in private practice. They suggest ways in which social workers deal with overwhelming case scenarios such as client suicide, with reference to the literature on vicarious traumatic stress and burnout. Drawing on two extended case vignettes, Fox and Cooper believe the support of colleagues is pivotal to enabling social workers to cope with suicidal clients. They recommend that those working with traumatised and suicidal clients form group practices for education, support and sharing. These formal and informal networks assist in ensuring accountability and quality assurance, and a working through of often painful feelings that arise for the worker (Fox and Cooper, 1998:155-156).

An important theme in the literature review was the need to ameliorate the effects of trauma on the worker (Figley, 1995; Oliveri and Waterman, 1993; Folette et al., 1994; Herman, 1992; Grosh and Olsen, 1994; Pearlman and McMan, 1995). Coping strategies that were mentioned most frequently as increasing resiliency included education related to sexual abuse, supervision, consultation, maintaining an attitude of 'optimistic perseverance', avoidance, seeking social support and inner peace and humour (Medeiros and Procaska, 1995). Education about vicarious traumatic stress as an occupational hazard that is routinely encountered on the job by social workers and therapists, is recommended. Further research seemed warranted that identified factors that might increase the resiliency of workers who assist trauma survivors.

Research design and methodology

Following an initial review of the literature on vicarious traumatic stress and related concepts such as 'burn out' and 'compassion fatigue', and prior to commencement of the fieldwork, a focus group of four counsellors registered for ACC counselling, was recruited. The focus group was formed, with reference to a critical-reflective perspective recommend drawing out the individual practitioner's theory of action from accounts of their own practice (Napier and Fook, 2001). These authors used extended case narratives with reflection from the practitioner as to how they resolved practice dilemmas (ibid). The focus group, through discussing breakthroughs in their own practice and sharing their practice wisdom, enabled me to formulate through a critical-reflective process, practical insights into vicarious traumatic stress. I was then able to use these insights to formulate my own original theories about stress and trauma.

Using a qualitative research design, I conducted in-depth interviews with 12 ACC-approved counsellors and their significant others. The research was approved by Victoria University's Human Ethics Committee prior to the commencement of the fieldwork. Each participant was asked to identify a support person prior to the interview in case the research evoked personal issues that required further discussion.

Thirty-six individuals were interviewed using a semi-structured topic guide and a 'discussion starter'. Twenty-two ACC-approved counsellors were interviewed in total, as some professional significant others nominated by the primary counsellors were also working as sexual abuse therapists. The 'discussion starter' was a list of statements drawn from the research literature on vicarious traumatic stress detailing some of the commonly experienced signs and behaviours linked to vicarious traumatic stress. A copy of the original article by Pearlman and McCann (1990) was provided for comment. In addition to asking the counsellors to reflect on these issues in relation to their own experience and practice, I asked them to reflect upon defining moments in their work, what happened and how they dealt with these events. The intention was to learn more about the strategies used by counsellors to resolve dilemmas and issues in their work. Counsellors were then asked to nominate a person who was a significant other in a personal sense such as a friend, family member or partner and a significant other in the professional arena, such as a colleague or associate, each to be interviewed separately. The aim was to assemble three perspectives of the primary counsellor from three different vantage points.

Interviews with the significant others were conducted along similar lines to the primary participants, using a semi-structured topic guide. Background on the history of the relationship they had with the counsellors was sought, together with their views as to whether they considered the counsellor had been affected by the nature of their work. If so, clarifying questions were asked as to what they had observed and what the effects were from their perspectives.

The interviews were audiotaped with consent and transcribed. The major themes from the interviews were analysed using a feminist narrative theoretical framework (Richardson, L. in Lincoln and Denzin, 1994 and Featherstone, 2000) and the original vicarious traumatic stress framework (McCann and Pearlman, 1990). The qualitative research design and methodology enabled factors to emerge that were not encompassed in McCann and Pearlman's original research (1990) on vicarious traumatic stress. Traditionally the topic of vicarious traumatic stress had been studied using a quantitative design and methodology from the perspective of clinical psychology. As a social worker, I decided to adopt a more in-depth, qualitative research design, which would allow the participants to tell their personal stories that were associated with the topic of vicarious traumatic stress.

Profile of participants

All the major occupational groupings of professionals listed in the ACC Register of Approved Counsellors were represented. Social workers, psychotherapists, clinical psychologists and counsellors were recruited using a strategic random sampling method, drawn from ACC’s Register of Approved Counsellors. Two counsellors self identified as Maori and Pacific Island counsellors (a separate list of specialists within the Register). Only four of the primary counsellors were men, reflecting the gender balance of the ACC Register of Approved Counsellors.

Four counsellors who were approached declined to participate due to the lack of financial incentive and/or because they could not spare time away from their counselling practices.

The significant others were the spouses, partners, friends, colleagues and adult children of the counsellors. Three personal significant others declined to be interviewed due to personal circumstances such as family commitments and lack of time.

Sources of stress and trauma

The tension between early training and on-the-job experiences

Much of the early training of the counsellors interviewed was grounded in Freudian psychoanalytic and individual psychotherapeutic traditions. However, Freud had concluded in his own work that his patients’ reports of sexual abuse were untrue, and repudiated his earlier theories that would have implicated impropriety to a large section of respectable family men of the day. He concluded that his patients’ disclosures of abuse were fantasies based in their own incestuous wishes (Herman, 1992). The culture of secrecy and disbelief that surrounded such theories became enshrined not only in the counsellor participants’ original training but also in the employing organisational philosophies, for many of the counsellors interviewed. This experience caused considerable tension and was described by the counsellor participants as being akin to disjunction or being out of kilter with oneself. In an effort to challenge this culture of disbelief, that was also a part of their training, the counsellor participants found it necessary to maintain a dual focus on the individual and the surrounding community and society of which they and their clients were a part. A systemic analysis of abuse and oppression was central to positioning themselves in a more collegial relationship with their clients. This reformulation of the therapeutic relationship away from the more traditional models of ‘expert-knows-best’ was considered essential to promoting healing. As many of the counsellor participants began working in the field of sexual abuse counselling prior to a time when abuse was openly discussed, they described a sense of isolation in the work. The counsellor participants experimented with other theoretical approaches than those in which they had been trained to bridge this sense of dissonance or disjunction.

One counsellor participant wishing to be known as Ellen, was a trailblazer in the New Zealand sexual abuse counselling scene. Her personal narrative illustrates the eclecticism of roles and approaches that were evoked by the historical times in which she was working and the dynamic tension between her early training and later on the job experiences. For Ellen and the other counsellor-participants, these transformations necessitate a reformulation of who one is, what one does and how one engages with clients, as the following interview excerpt illustrates:

I started training in 1975. That was writing letters in response to a programme, which was one of the programmes on radio, initially, about life and life issues, and people began spontaneously to write in response to the programme. That was where I think I first began to learn how much people hurt, especially when they had a safe way of expressing their hurt. And it was there that I began reading about the extensive sexual abuse that was going on in New Zealand in secret. And elsewhere, of course. One important lesson that I learned out of this was that one could invite a person whom I was corresponding with, to write in as much detail as they felt safe to or able to do. To either write in detail or to draw what the trauma was or what the pictures were that stayed in their mind. Flashbacks really. And by correspondence we were actually able to work through those. I find it quite extraordinary now looking back on that because I didn’t even know that post traumatic stress disorder existed. I certainly didn’t know what the name would be but we were actually working with it then. Now by 1986 I was probably dealing with hundreds of letters, many of them were about their own abuse but not prepared to talk about it to the authorities, so we have quite a lot of experience then in talking to perpetrators by letter. Later that became phone counselling and even later I became a co-host and dealt with sexual abuse, incest and so on, on air. The issues were widespread: they crossed socioeconomic barriers. There was just a very widespread exposure to abuse issues for the first time in the country. However by 1991, now trained as a psychotherapist, I decided that I wanted to work more in depth with abused and traumatised clients and I knew that was going to be looking at longer-term work. And this continues. In that time I had worked with clients who had been ritually abused as children and DID (dissociative identity disorder) clients, and it’s been, through working with them, I think, that most of my internally changing would have taken place.

Coming to terms with one’s own traumatic experiences

Many of the counsellor-participants had experienced traumatic events including sexual abuse, in their pasts. This theme is similarly reflected in the literature of helping professionals disclosing traumatic personal histories (Folette et al., 1994; Pope and Feldman-Summers, 1992; Martin et al., 1986) They had discovered that their own healing from these experiences was instrumental in guiding their work with traumatised clients. When worked through, in the course of therapy with clients, the counsellor-participants described drawing on a vast pool of intuitive wisdom and knowledge to guide their work with clients. Their experiential insights, arising from their healing from traumatic experiences, were described as being more important that any of the theories propounded in psychological textbooks. They used this knowledge to engage in social and political action to address the societal myths about abuse and to work actively towards greater social equity.

Balancing work in the therapy field with social change and action has been recommended as an antidote to vicarious traumatisation (Pearlman and Saakvitne, 1995). The counsellor participants concurred with this recommendation. For a participant wishing to be known as Hayley, counselling survivors was seen as a natural outworking of her values and personal philosophy that had been shaped by her own abuse experiences:

In terms of trauma work, the personal experience was one of the pieces and positive experiences I had in terms of receiving counselling. If I go back even further to think of why I was so much into the rights issue then it would be as well living in different cultures and seeing at a young age people who had a lot more rights than other people. So that has always been there for me in terms of rights and justice issues.

Lifestyle changes and dissatisfaction with agency philosophy: the movement into private practice

Vicarious traumaisation was seen as a theme in the early years of practice and for many counsellor participants. These formative experiences prompted a movement into other roles and private practice. The operation of agencies, and the protection & efficacy, was specifically mentioned as being 'traumatising'. However, this was described as being directly rather than vicariously traumatised. A counsellor participant wishing to be known as Audrey, a clinical psychologist working with children and families in a child protection agency, had a child client abducted despite her best efforts at care and protection. She identified this as the most traumatising incident of her career. What was considered as 'traumatising' was the assessment role that was required which was seen as conflicting with her efforts in therapy. She decided to leave the department to establish her own private practice, but kept being offered incentives to stay. She decided to combine roles as a stepping stone to leaving to establish her own private practice:

"...It was having to stop having the focus on assessment and broaden my skills because I thought if I stay in this for four to five years, I thought, that's not very good for my career, so I will broaden it. Which happened for the first couple of months and then I did one assessment and they saw that I could do it and they needed more, so I just got hundreds of assessments. I still kept my therapy going though."

Once in private practice, however, there were still dilemmas. The administrative requirements and needing to obtain specific details of abuse which might re-traumatising the client, were discussed by the counsellor-participants. A participant wishing to be known as Sally, in the following passage, discusses the ethical dilemmas surrounding what was seen as 'sexual abuse' under ACC legislation, and thus who would be eligible for treatment services and other entitlements:

I have had a case just recently, a new client, who in terms of abuse, if you look at it on a scale of her abuse, might be three out of 10, but for her, the effects on her life have been 10 out of 10. It was hard, in fact, when we were filling out the form I was thinking: 'Here, they [ACC] might not pay out on this one, because it's not a biggie in the wider scheme of things.' But in terms of the trauma in the person's life, that's something. It's really useful for me, I thought, as a grounding to understand that it's not what happened, it's the effect over time.

Challenges to maintaining connection: relationships and intimacy

Partner and intimate relationships

Physical intimacy was often discussed by the husbands and partners as problematic with the counsellor-participants. Three husbands of counsellors discussed the emotional detachment that they saw resulting from their wives work-related demands. However, the husbands' sensitivity to being perceived by their counsellor-wives as being less than politically correct in their dealings with women, seemed to also alter the dynamics of the relationship. One husband explained to me that he considered his wife's expectations of him had changed in the area of physical intimacy. He said that he struggled to know what was 'appropriate' conduct for him in this aspect of their relationship.

Male significant others who were the partners of the counsellors worried about being identified with the perpetrators of abuse. Several of the husbands had separated from their counsellor wives as they felt it was too difficult to remain in the relationship. The partners who were involved in the helping professions had a shared frame of reference that meant that these issues were not identified as problematic.

Relationships with children

For adult children of the counsellor-participants, becoming more responsible at a younger age was described, due to their awareness of parental emotional detachment, tiredness or unavailability. One daughter of a counsellor thought she had taken on more responsibility due to her mother's work. She explains:

Well, I was only quite young when she started [counselling], but I think I started worrying then. I am more worried than I would be if she didn't do the work. And I think I'm also more responsible.

Protectiveness of teenage daughters by their counsellor mothers was a source of conflict at home. One daughter was forbidden to socialise at night due to her mother's fears that she might be sexually assaulted.

Factors increasing resilience

Using a wide range of theoretical approaches in practice

The counsellor participants drew from a number of theoretical approaches to increase their effectiveness with traumaised clients. The advantage of assembling a bricolage of approaches when working in the field of sexual assault, was that it increased their ability to bounce back or maintain resilience in the face of the rigours of day-to-day practice as the research participants were able to bring theory into line with practice realities. These theoretical frameworks included narrative, strengths-based, critical-reflective approaches in social work, feminist and emancipatory approaches. In comparison to the individual theories based in medical models, grounded in diagnosis and treatment, they were able to include the wider social and political context in which the abuse occurred.

Another participant, wishing to be known as Mary, trained as a social worker in the 1960s. Mary remarked that sexual abuse was not discussed during her training and so, like Ellen, she felt ill-prepared for working as a residential social worker with many children who had experiences of deprivation and abuse. Mary became interested in narrative therapy later in her career, after travelling overseas to train as a psychotherapist and couple counsellor. Narrative therapy was a means of being where the clients were so that it enabled her to join with clients on their own terms. She explains how narrative therapy offers a way of being in relationship to clients, hearing their pain while retaining her own optimism for their healing:

What I am enjoying now about where some of the narrative writers have got to is the both/and, rather than going into dualisms. The importance of acknowledging pain and then offering hope as well. And that comes back full circle with clients into therapy which is really hearing and letting the client know that you are really hearing... It's something about not moving somebody on but encouraging the person to be where they are when they themselves are able to be there.

The New Trauma therapy epitomised in the work of John Briere, Christine Courtois and Judith Herman was another theoretical framework that the counsellor participants said they found helpful in their work with sexual abuse survivors. Sally explains how the theories of John Briere and Judith Herman were congruent with her beliefs and supportive of her way of thinking about the origins of abuse:

I think they [Herman and Briere] fit in well without dragging out the theoretical model. My own belief is that abuse is something that is perpetuated from generation to generation so if one can do some really early childhood education that prevents this, that long term, there would be much less abuse. Because abuse is not a new thing, it has been going on for generations and I think back to historical readings of Victorian times when there was a very high level of abuse and it was accepted because it was very much power over somebody. And in Victorian times, the lord of the manor could do what he liked to his servants. Class was a factor and I don't believe that class is a factor, any longer, particularly not in New Zealand. I believe it is more of a learned behaviour.

Maintaining relationships with professional support networks

The relationships that the counsellors had with their colleagues, supervisors and professional associations protected them from a sense of separation that is a key experience of work with trauma survivors. Trauma is often recalled in fragments that have the potential for fragmenting the counsellor's own experience of their world. This is a major theme in the vicarious traumatisation literature.

These networks also enable counsellors' personal and professional development through the discussion of inconsistencies arising between theory, practice, personally held philosophies and the employing agency's philosophy. The relationships forged at workshops, professional practice and conferences. These created 'liminal' spaces to creatively bridge the gap between the dissonance they experience on the job due to the gap between theory and practice. 'Liminal space' is a term developed by anthropologist Barbara Myerhoff to describe places of betwixt and between in which those people work through traumatic experience and evolve new ways of being (Myerhoff, 1982). I found this concept to explaining the ways in which the counsellor participants mediated their dissonance, to formulate new ways of attaching meaning to experience in the field of sexual abuse therapy.

A counsellor participant wishing to be known as Rose valued being part of a women's group exploring her spirituality and a community of psychodramatists. Her relationship with a woman from this group led to a professional association lasting over 20 years. They facilitated a therapy group for women who had been survivors of sexual assault:

I was brought up in Catholic culture, and what I received from that is very important to me, but a lot of the dogma does not fit with my beliefs anymore. So I meet with them once a month and more often with individual members. And there is another community I met through psychodrama. I came in contact with an independent church group, though, which highly values being free from dogma and at the same time celebrating spirituality in a structured way.

Spirituality

The search for inner strength through the growth of spirituality was connected with the counsellor participants' increasing disillusionment with hierarchical, patriarchal structures. They developed an awareness of being connected to a greater source of being which replaced earlier held religious beliefs. These revised beliefs established a context for continuing to practise as a sexual abuse counsellor. A consultant to the present study, who wished to be known as George, was a minister of religion prior to his decision to train to become a psychotherapist. In a similar way, four of the other counsellor participants had left their respective churches as ministers of religion and moved into counselling. George saw this movement into therapy and away from the church as 'a natural progression':

People ask me why I left and I said it was interfering with my spiritual growth. I had been a minister of religion prior to his decision to train to become a psychotherapist. I found this concept to explaining the ways in which the counsellor participants mediated their dissonance, to formulate new ways of attaching meaning to experience in the field of sexual abuse therapy.

A counsellor participant wishing to be known as Rose valued being part of a women's group exploring her spirituality and a community of psychodramatists. Her relationship with a woman from this group led to a professional association lasting over 20 years. They facilitated a therapy group for women who had been survivors of sexual assault:

I was brought up in Catholic culture, and what I received from that is very important to me, but a lot of the dogma does not fit with my beliefs anymore. So I meet with them once a month and more often with individual members. And there is another community I met through psychodrama. I came in contact with an independent church group, though, which highly values being free from dogma and at the same time celebrating spirituality in a structured way.

Spirituality

For the women who decided to leave the Church of whom they were either members or ministers, the increasing number of sexual abuse cases coming to light within the Church, formed background to their decision to move away. Frustration at trying to change the system from within by trying to make it more accessible and supportive toward women, became an aim that the participants did not think it realistic to achieve. Sally, herself a minister, explains:

I guess in the end I got very disillusioned with the Church. And so a part of that, not the whole, just a small part, I was involved in the area where people were coming out about sexual abuse cases within the Church. And that was the last straw I think. [Pause to consider]. Yes it was. And it was a period of change for me but it seemed like I was already moving away from the Church and then just to become aware of the abuse, of actual cases that were going on. One was aware that there had been abuse in a wide sense, but to actually now hear specific cases. I thought: 'I don't actually want to be part of this abusive situation’. they were all little points to saying: ‘you've got choice, you’ve tried to change the system or you can actually leave the system’. And I decided: ‘no, I would rather leave’. I think I have spent too long trying to change systems, so let’s have a break.

Diversifying work roles and caseloads

Sometimes it was enough to change the balance of one’s work to restore the balance of one’s life, to remain professionally effective. The vicarious traumatisation literature recommends that caseloads and workloads are regularly reviewed to provide a balance of interests. Several of the counsellor-participants had made a decision to do less work in the trauma field. In practice, the counsellor-participants said it was difficult to reduce or change workloads, as they had gained a ‘niche’ for specialising in particular kinds of work. Another of the counsellors interviewed describes her decision to change the balance in her work:

Well, yeah, it is not quite half sexual abuse work now, but basically my aim was to have a mix. Before I had been doing full time, almost all sexual abuse work for 12 years, mainly assessments. Probably about 80 or 90 percent of my work was sexual abuse work and about 10 percent would have been therapy - 20 percent therapy and the rest assessments. So it was nice to have a balance.

The implications for social work theories of practice

There are three levels on which the counsellor-participants described as being related to their sense of dissonance. Each level is interrelated and changes in one level impact or have repercussions on the other levels. This ‘ripple effect’ is not specifically referred to in the vicarious traumatisation literature. This research suggests that the awareness of this dissonance jettisons counsellors into unknown zones or ‘liminal spaces’, that, when traversed, create discursive spaces and support networks within which the experience can be worked with creatively and transformed.

In the following sections, I conceptualise these levels as:

- The internal consistency of theoretical frameworks and the felt gap between theory and practice.
- The space between organisational philosophy and the counsellor’s evolving personal and theoretical frameworks and philosophies for practice.
- The space that exists between the client and counsellor in the therapeutic relationship.

To illustrate the facets included in this multi-dimensional model of stress and trauma, I refer to each level but reiterate that each level on which trauma and stress is experienced is interrelated and can only be understood as a whole process.

Level one: A search for meaning: finding a theoretical basis for practice

Early on, the job experiences necessitated the creation of liminal spaces in preparation for working with clients who had been multiply abused. In such spaces, the counsellor-participants used narrative and a range of strengths-based and emancipatory approaches in the absence of other theoretical knowledge that worked, to create new possibilities for attributing meaning to experience. The telling and re-telling of personal and collective narratives based in stories of survival mediated moments when practitioners were aware of a pervading sense of disjunction. In adopting these frameworks, practitioners were entering a space in which they began to discover what works with traumatised clients, and what does not. Sometimes the original theoretical framework was found wanting and was discarded. In other instances, fragments were used in a collage that bore little resemblance to any one theory yet represented a sufficient and complete framework for working, however disparate and cobbled together it might at first appear. Through repeated practice with each client, the internal consistency of the emerging theoretical approach was tested. Each client is, therefore, a test of the particular synthesis of theoretical approaches which the practitioner uses.

Level two: The therapeutic relationship: the translation of theory into practice

In choosing the particular mix of theoretical approaches in working with sexually abuse clients, practitioners sought to position themselves into a collaborative framework. This was a common element in the way that the counsellor-participants bridged their sense of dissonance. This was the major learning to emerge from their immersion and engagement in their work within sexual abuse therapy. Narrative and story telling represent a primary means of integrating theory and practice when working with traumatised clients. Perspectives that encompassed a dual focus on the individual and the wider social narratives enabled the counsellor-participants to transcend the ‘quick-fix’ mentality prevalent in institutions based around monetarist policies and case management practices. In the field of trauma, the discourse of ‘quick-fix’ no longer seemed appropriate, as it threatened the internal consistency of the practitioner’s theoretical frameworks.

With the movement of the counsellor-participants into private practice supported by ACC funding, there were wider issues of power and control at stake for counsellors of sexually abused clients. However, master theories within psychotherapy founded in Freudian psychoanalytic concepts, reflected models of women as existing in deficit and lack. Feminist and body work theories enabled the counsellor-participants to position themselves in alternative theoretical frameworks. Moments of crisis in therapy were often first noticed by the counsellors as a series of bodily sensations. These signs became constitutive of meaning in working with clients who had been sexually abused. It was also informative of the process and transference within therapy. At times, the male counsellor-participants described a sense of otherness or displacement as being a man in female places, when engaged with abuse work with survivors and with women colleagues who worked as therapists.

Level three: Organisational, professional discourses and personal philosophies

The third site of dissonance was related to conflicting roles and organisational philosophies in which practitioners find themselves working. The requirements and expectations of the agencies involved in sexual abuse work often placed the counsellor-participant in an assessing, forensic or expert role vis-à-vis the client. The hierarchical relationship that was established when the counsellor was cast in these roles meant that it was difficult to form and maintain a more collaborative relationship that was seen to be fundamental to healing from trauma. The counsellor faced a crisis of not being able to carry through with their original intentions for entering the work which was to establish a relationship in which healing could occur. Consequently, the agency structure and functioning placed the therapeutic relationship under risk of various disruptions and ruptures that effectively separated the client and counsellor from being in a relationship with one another. This loss of connection is a key component of stress and trauma for practitioners.

Social workers and other professionals who work in statutory agencies in which there are care and control dilemmas on a daily basis, experience the dissonance that leads to the creation of a liminal space, but are often hampered by agency and time demands from using this space for personal and professional development. Without a space for reflection and developing insight into one's own practice, workers face becoming professionally marginalised and isolated for holding differing views and perspectives. In the absence of connection with their professional peers, they are missing a primary means of ameliorating stress and trauma, which can be achieved through support and connection.

Conclusion

The counsellor-participants drew upon particular truths that were quite different and at times at odds with the discursive frameworks used by their partners, friends and adult children, who lacked a practical understanding of what it meant to work in the sexual abuse counselling field. Personal significant others generally knew less about sexual abuse, trauma and psychotherapy than their professional counterparts. The new demands of being politically aware and correct were seen as being too hard for some partners who had decided to 'flag the relationship' and look elsewhere to meet their emotional needs for connection. Those significant others who were involved as therapists or in allied helping fields, had a shared frame of reference for understanding the sense of dissonance that often accompanied the work. This research suggests that personal significant others need access to a liminal space parallel to that of the counsellor participant to explore the impact for them of living with a counsellor who is engaged in a process of self-transformation.

The counsellor participants move beyond the competency criteria to enact their personal and professional values and philosophies as a way of dealing with the experience of dissonance, which is the hallmark of traumatic stress in the New Zealand context of sexual abuse counselling. There is a movement from one theoretical framework to a bricolage of many, from a rule-bound to a process-oriented context. Successfully finding the means to create multiple layers of experience through the creation of liminal places is crucial to mediating this dissonance. Practice in a synthesis of theoretical frameworks provides a context for establishing and maintaining connection on a variety of levels: within the self of the therapist, with others including clients and the counsellors' significant others, and with the wider social discourses in which sexual abuse counselling is located.

References

